the bacteria shut down most of their protein production, but ramped up certain genes needed to make carbohydrates, such as glycogen